

Carrie Konold [ckonold@umich.edu] is a Ph.D candidate in political science at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, MI. She studies comparative public opinion and the politics of secularism and Islamic law, with a particular focus on family law reform in West and North Africa. She carried out a year of dissertation fieldwork in Senegal and completed an original public opinion survey in Dakar in 2005. She spent time in Algeria (2001; 2007-2008); Ghana (2001); Senegal (2003); and Morocco (2003). Her dissertation focuses on citizen support for and opposition to the recently debated Islamic personal law in Senegal. She explores how elite discourse and media coverage frame debates about family law reform, and how these frames influence public preferences. Her project combines analysis of citizen narratives, media content, and quantitative analysis of public opinion data. Her graduate studies and fieldwork have been funded by the Fulbright IIE, the National Science Foundation, the Council of American Overseas Research Centers, and the Charlotte W. Newcombe Foundation. She was also a visiting fellow at Princeton University's Center for the Study of Democratic Politics in 2008-2009. In 2004, she co-authored an article in Public Opinion Quarterly on political generations in Algeria. She is also interested in citizen perceptions of corruption and presented work at the Micro-Foundations of Mass Politics in Africa Conference at Michigan State University in 2007, and the International Society of Political Psychology. She has also written on religious networks and political tolerance using her survey data from Senegal, which she presented at the American Political Science Association in 2008.