

D. Jason Berggren [berggren@uga.edu] is currently a post-doctoral teaching fellow at the University of Georgia where he teaches courses on the US presidency, religion and American politics, and American government. In 2007, he received his Ph.D in political science from Florida International University in Miami. The subject of his dissertation was on the evangelical presidential leadership style of Jimmy Carter titled: "I Had a Different Way of Governing." He also earned his MA and BA degrees in religion from Florida State University and Eckerd College. He is the co-author of a book chapter (with Nicol C. Rae) titled: "George W. Bush, Religion, and European Anti-Americanism," in Brendon O'Connor's Anti-Americanism: History, Causes, and Themes. He has published articles in the Presidential Studies Quarterly, including "Jimmy Carter and George W. Bush: Faith, Foreign Policy, and an Evangelical Presidential Style" (with Nicol C. Rae), and "Two Parties, Two Types of Nominees, Two Paths to Winning a Presidential Nomination, 1972-2004." The latter received attention in the Washington Post in January and February 2008. Other articles have been published in White House Studies, the Forum, the Journal of Church and State, Justice System Journal, Middle East Affairs Journal, and the American Journal of Islamic Social Sciences (AJISS). One of his two articles in the Middle East Affairs Journal, "Obstacles to an Alliance: Muslims and the Christian Right," was subsequently translated into Arabic by Sadig Malki of King Aziz University and published in 2004 by the King Faisal Center for Research and Islamic Studies, Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. He has entries in the Encyclopedia of Campaigns, Elections, and Electoral Behavior and the Encyclopedia of the First Amendment. He has presented conference papers at the American, Midwest, and Southern Political Science Association meetings, the British Political Studies Association meeting, the Georgia and Florida State Political Science Association meetings, Calvin College's Symposium on Religion and Politics, and the Citadel's Symposium on Southern Politics.
