

Katherine Merriman [krm150@mail.harvard.edu] is currently working with the Pluralism Project, Harvard University, Cambridge, MA. She is an independent researcher in the fields of Islamic studies and the anthropology of religion, with a specialization in Muslim diasporas in the West. She has just returned from Aleppo, Syria where she served her term as a Vassar College Ann Cornelisen Language Fellow by studying Arabic at the French Institute of the Near East (Aleppo). In 2010, she graduated from Harvard Divinity School with a Masters of Theological Studies in Islamic studies and during her program worked as a research associate for the Pluralism Project under Professor Diana Eck. She has published on Muslim communities in Greater Boston, religious diversity in Germany, and Muslim women activists. Her paper for this year's conference is supported by the Pluralism Project as a Student Affiliate Project. Ms. Merriman is currently an active member and volunteer for Alwan for the Arts and the Iraqi Student Project. She hopes to start a Ph.D program in the fall of 2012.