

Khaled Troudi [kt241@exeter.ac.uk] is a Ph.D candidate in Arab and Islamic studies at the University of Exeter, UK. His thesis is titled, “Hermeneutics of the Qur’anic Narrative.” He received his MA (2005) in comparative religion from Western Michigan University, Kalamazoo, MI; his thesis was titled, “The Concept of the Qur’an: Theological Disputation about the Createdness and the Uncreatedness of the Qur’an in Muslim Theology.” His graduate studies highlighted Western philosophy, mythology, religious anthropology, and dogmatic sects. These courses allowed him to encounter the Western academic approach in the study of religion, in general, and Islam in particular. He earned his BA (1993) in Islamic studies and Qur’anic sciences from the Islamic University of Medina, Saudi Arabia. Mr. Troudi’s undergraduate studies focused on comparative study of the Arabic language and Islamic literature, history of Qur’anic Arabic and Qur’anic sciences, and Islamic studies and civilization. He is also a research associate at the International Institute of Islamic Thought (IIIT), Herndon, VA.
