

Soha Bayoumi is a lecturer in the Department of the History of Science at Harvard University. She received her Ph.D. in 2012 from the Paris Institute of Political Studies (SciencesPo) in political theory and philosophy, and currently works on the question of justice at the intersection of political philosophy, intellectual history and science studies. With a focus on health and medicine, her research addresses the question of health and social justice, biomedical ethics and the links between medicine and politics, with a geographical focus on the Middle East and a special interest in postcolonial and gender studies. She is currently finishing a book manuscript (co-authored with Sherine F. Hamdy, Brown University) on the role of doctors in the Egyptian uprising of 2011 and the intricacies of practicing medicine in the context of social and political upheaval. She is also working on another book project on the question of health and social justice and the social roles of doctors in postcolonial Egypt.
