

Usaama al-Azami [usaama01@gmail.com] is a Ph.D. candidate at Princeton University's Department of Near Eastern Studies. His dissertation examines Islamic legal and religious reform in the modern period, focusing on the transformation of maṣlaḥa and maqāṣid discourses, as well as the development of political thought and siyāsa sharʿiyya. He began seriously studying Arabic in 2002, and went on to complete a B.A. in Arabic and Islamic studies at Oxford University in 2008. As part of his studies, he travelled throughout the Middle East. He focuses on the ideas of Arab Islamist thinkers primarily among the Muslim Brotherhood and Salafī trends in North Africa and the Gulf. He has a range of interests including early Islamic history and the formative period, Qurʾanic studies, hadith studies, early Sunni law, diachronic legal studies, modern discourses on jihad, Islamic theology, Sufism, Islam in the West, Western intellectual history, comparative political theory, and comparative law. He has a number of publications currently under review, pertaining to modern jihad studies; modern Islamist political thought; and an annotated translation of a medieval text pertaining to the Damascene jurist-theologian, Ibn Taymiyya. His book reviews have been published in the American Journal of Islamic Social Sciences (AJISS). He has given academic presentations at the American Academy of Religion, Exeter University (UK), the United States Army War College, and the Diplomatic Academy of Vienna.